The relative appearances and distribution of these two types of cells pointed to their both being circulating megakaryocytes, the majority being filtered off in the pulmonary alveolar capillaries, where they become compressed. The paucity of these cells in other tissues is a reflection of the small number of megakaryocytes capable of passing along the alveolar capillaries. The presence of these cells in the lungs and to a lesser extent elsewhere appears to be a frequent occurrence in both ...

The histology-based Dallas criteria are not sufficient to diagnose myocarditis, and they should be supplemented by immunohistochemical identification and quantification of inflammatory infiltrates. Search for cardiotrophic viruses, mainly by PCR, is essential for the aetiological definition of myocardial inflammation, with important prognostic and therapeutic implications.
